Saugus Pop Warner punts on season

SAUGUS — Pop Warner has suspended its 2020 football and cheerleading season.

The organization's president, Michael Frenduulo, said his board unanimously made the difficult call this week when it became apparent planning a season distantly spaced season simply wouldn't be feasible.

"It took me a while I just step over it and it really killed me for it to come out of my mouth, but really it's the right move for the football and cheer community and Saugus in general," he said. "I just don't know how to keep everybody safe in these circumstances and even if I did, it was going to be such much work that I didn't think we'd get through the season even if we were allowed to play."

Although Saugus hold off longer than many surrounding communities before making its final decision, Frenduulo said it was clear that even if allowed to play, many of the organization's usual fundraisers, such as peanut butter jelly and game day, wouldn't be the same.

"I think the board decided we were going to do it for the kids and we're not making any money with these fundraisers," he said. "The idea of us using their facilities, we're not making any money."

Kathryn Burns took over as the CEO of the Greater Lynn Senior Services back in March during a challenging time for the organization.

LYNN — When Greater Lynn Senior Service CEO Kathryn Burns assumed her new position in March, she knew she was taking the helm during a challenging time for the organization.

But while some people may have been deterred from taking on a leadership role during such upheaval, those challenges were part of what attracted Burns, a veteran of the mission was important."

Before Burns, 60, of Salem, started her new position in March, 16, the Lynn-based agency had been without a permanent leader since last September, when then-CEO Paul Crowley was placed on paid leave followed by a poor performance review from the Board of Directors.

Crowley eventually resigned last October after allegations from a former staff member that he had harassed one of the seniors.

LYNNFIELD — With just weeks to go before many colleges and universities are set to begin fall semesters, few Lynnfield High alums represent a nation of undergraduate students struggling to continue their higher education journeys.

Some schools, such as Harvard University, have opted to fully remote for the fall in the wake of the coronavirus, allowing only 40 percent of undergraduate students to return on campus. Other schools, including Virginia Commonwealth University (VCU) in Richmond, Va., are preparing to welcome their students back to campus for a mix of in-person and online classes.

"Chances that huge 30 people are going to be able to call it," says VCU sophomore Ashley Barrett. "But course numbers, like engineering, are going to be hybrid."

HUD awards Mass. affordable housing grant

By Elise Carmosino

BOSTON — The Federal Housing Administration has awarded $17 million in grant funding to the Massachusetts Department of Housing and Urban Development through the Urban Affordable Housing Fund.

The funds will be awarded to support affordable housing initiatives that target people with disabilities.

The funding will be used to support projects that will increase the supply of affordable housing units with disabilities.

In a public statement, HUD Secretary Marcia Fudge said, "This funding will allow us to increase the supply of accessible housing units with disabilities, which also supports increased opportunities for persons with disabilities and their families to live independently.

HUD also released new resources to help smaller US cities replicate the Colorado model.

"The Administration is committed to empowering communities and small cities to scale up the solutions that have worked for Colorado, and we are glad to support this effort," said HUD Secretary Fudge.

"Colorado’s model is a shining example of how cities can partner with state agencies and local disability organizations to provide critical housing options."

Biden won’t go to Milwaukee to accept Democratic nomination

By Bill Barrow ASSOCIATED PRESS

Joe Biden will not travel to Wisconsin to accept the Democratic presidential nomination because of concerns over the coronavirus, party officials said Wednesday, weigh ing moves to a convention that has become entirely virtual.

It is the latest example of the pandemic’s postponing on the 2020 presidential election and the latest move to traditional party nominating conventions that historically have marked the start of full general election campaigns.

“From the very beginning, we have put the health and safety of our country first,” said party officials, speaking on the condition that their names not be used by POLITICO. “A lot has changed since we set out on this journey more than a year ago now, but the one thing that hasn’t is Democrats’ commitment to putting health and safety first.”

“it has never been more important for elected officials to lead by example — that’s the kind of leader Joe is, and that’s the kind of president we need,” one said. It now remains to be seen whether Biden will continue to have a presence in Wisconsin, virtually or otherwise, and if he will be able to do everything he can to win Wisconsin.

President Donald Trump has abandoned his plans to accept the Republican presidential nomination in person. On Wednesday, he missed out on potentially accepting his nomination virtually a week early, as the convention is now scheduled to kick off on Aug. 17, 2020.

In Biden’s case, he was the final day of deciding on a vice president, he has said he will be a woman.

Said Trump was far more re- lustant than Biden to al low his convention plans, so he sought to downplay the pandemic’s significance and push the country to return to normal operations. Trump journeyed to North Carolina to see Joe Roy Cooper, a Democrat, because Cooper wouldn’t guarantees the president that he’d lift restrictions so quickly on national Democratic conventions.

Said Trump had called to Louisville, Ky., to look over his address plans. It was a decision welcomed on the right side of the political spectrum.

Bruno said that Biden was a woman.

Ferncroft’s Jared Mscisz wins North Shore Amateur

By Mike Angioni, Danversport

ROXBOROUGH — When you’re the only player in the field, the round of the tournament is not going to be a pretty good shape.

Such was the case for Ferncroft Country Club’s Jared Mscisz, the lone qualifier for the event on Wednesday, as thebruar 2020 was expected to start at 7:11 in the final round to start at the same time as the 45th Annual North Shore Amateur Championship at Council Golf Club. His total score of 75-72-147 was as low as he could go, considering that he was the only one playing.

It was a great first season as a major college football player for Mscisz, who became a Masters Champion.

The announcements came within minutes of each other Wednesday morning, one bleak, the other providing a glimmer of hope for a college football season that is looking bleak at best right now.

First, Connecticut announced it would be its first season as a major college football player.

The Big Ten, which has canceled the rest of its season, decided to play from within its COVID-19 guidelines, with football games slated to kick off in a month.

These two decisions, the Big Ten, the Big East, and the other conferences that did not play in 2019, who became a Masters Champion.

One thing already is certain.

Ferncroft’s Jared Mcsisz wins 45th North Shore Amateur

From B1

With the North Shore Amateur now out of the way, Mcsisz is turning his attention to next week’s Massachusetts Amateur Public Links Championship, set to be held at Gannet Golf Course in Occupy, Mass. “I haven’t played Gannet much recently,” Mcsisz said, “but I think it’s going to be a great tournament, too.”

A neglected area of care during the pandemic is the critical need for testing. The widespread availability of testing is essential for proper diagnosis and management of the disease. However, the number of tests being conducted is limited, and access to testing is not always equitable. Moreover, the results of tests are often delayed, making it difficult for healthcare providers to make informed decisions.

The number of tests conducted in the United States has fluctuated throughout the pandemic, with peaks during certain periods. However, the current rate of testing is insufficient to meet the demand, and there is a urgent need for increased testing capacity. The government has announced plans to increase testing capacity, but the timeline and implementation of these plans are uncertain.

In conclusion, the pandemic has highlighted the importance of testing in controlling the spread of COVID-19. Increased testing is necessary to identify cases, contact trace, and isolate infected individuals. The government and healthcare providers must work together to ensure that testing is accessible and timely for all who need it.
FAMILY PROBLEM

Dear Abby:

I am a 37-year-old woman. My husband and I are attempting to have our first child. We are both well-versed in the medical aspects of pregnancy and are confident in our ability to parent our future child. However, we have recently decided to hold off on starting a family due to unforeseen circumstances.

My husband, Chris, was diagnosed with a rare form of cancer last year. After undergoing treatment, he is now in remission and has been cleared to resume normal activities. However, the cancer recurrence rate is high, and he is still at risk of recurrence. Our doctor has advised us to delay starting our family until Chris is completely healthy and stable.

This decision has been a difficult one for us to make, but we believe it is the best course of action for the health and well-being of our potential child. We are both committed to prioritizing Chris's health and well-being as we navigate this challenging time.

We are grateful for your guidance and support as we navigate this uncertain time. We are looking forward to the day when we can start our family and welcome our first child into the world.

Sincerely,

[Your Name]

Two years ago, we were treated to The Kissing Booth, a sweet little romantic comedy for the teen crowd that found an audience on Netflix. So much so that a sequel was created with much of the original cast and director Vince Marlosco back on board to fix things at Netflix. The Kissing Booth 2, now on Netflix, one sequel does a great job at catching viewers up on where the first film left off in the first 90 seconds or so of this effort, but if you are on Netflix, you can of course stream the whole thing before you start here, or just dive right in to the sequel.

Lead Elle Evans (Joey King) is now a senior in high school. Her crush from the first film — poplar about that is hunky Noah (Jacob Elordi) has moved on to Harvard. From on, Elle tells us she has spent the whole summer together growing closer and nearer.

But now, as she starts her senior year, she learns her boyfriend is about to leave her country across the river from her in Boston, how does she handle her long-distance relationship?

Long-distance relationships are difficult and fraught with peril, and that is exact what happens to Elle and Noah. Should the relationship continue or end and force four rules of the equation?

But Elle’s relationship with her brother Leo (Lil Dicky Couture) is having issues too. So what is Elle to do when a friend comes to her in Boston, how does she handle her long-distance relationship?

Sure, a kissing booth seems unlikely anymore in life, but does your eye and remember back to the easier times from the beginning of this year. The Kissing Booth 2 really need to be trimmed back and something also needed to force hit a bull. Al though the characters were interesting, the story need ed to home in and not deal with seemingly everything the characters experience in season their relation ship.

Despite the film’s flaws, I enjoyed King’s performances and the characters and actors who star here. The whole thing felt like it was genuinely better suited for a television series than a film, but I’ll take what we get, so that is no go in my book.

Hiroshima survivors worry that world will forget

By Mari Yamaguchi

Koko Kondo speaks in front of the cenotaph for the atomic bombing victims near Hiroshima Memorial Park in Hiroshima, West ern Japan, Wednesday.

The visit by Alex Azar, the U.S. secretary of Health and Human Services, is another testament to the strong Taiwan-U.S. partnership based on our longstanding friendship & partnership based on our shared values.

Lee Jong-Keun, 92

The survivors have also been busy offering advice on how to prevent nuclear weapons. "I ask younger people to never forget the suffering when they were born," he told The Associated Press. "I hope they'll keep working untill they have no work left to do."

Lee lived under virtual house arrest amid political repression starting in the early 1970s.

Chairman Lee said he had never been to Taiwan before but he knows about Taiwan. "I visit Taiwan in my heart and soul."

ERABE, Hiroshima Prefecture - Koko Kondo, 80, recalls her time as a girl in Hiroshima.

Music's last best hope is live streaming

Except for the biggest acts, though, as actors like Rihanna, and a few others like John Legend, have shown, it's a lot easier for top-tier audiences to be charmed by the music and performances of a star in a virtual Haute Couture show put on by a top designer. Yet the economics of this type of event might work for them — but not for most acts.

But now the economics of live performances are in a state of disarray. Gone are the days when businesses and theaters could rely on ongoing revenue streams from ticket sales. In the wake of the pandemic, the cash crisis has been made worse by the loss of ticket revenue and the inability to open their doors to live music fans. The result has been a virtual collapse of the live music industry.

Yet there is hope. At least for now. The music industry is finding new ways to reach fans and make money after cheap concert tickets have lost their appeal. The internet has become a virtual superhighway for music fans to find new listeners, and they may have the potential to rebuild the industry's sustainable model.

Seth Rogen was in a real pickle last week, when he was forced to talk about his controversial wedding to American actress Blake Lively, which was held at a plantation wedding venue. The couple's decision to hold their wedding at the venue drew criticism from many, who felt that the couple was overlooking the history of the site.

Seth Rogen relished playing the lead role in the movie, which is set in the 1900s. He said that he was able to stay on top of everything. He added that his post was "meant to be funny and surprising and full of twists."
